- [Instructor] Moving along with our grand tour of the SGA, now it's time to talk about the database buffer cache. Alongside the shared pool, it's one of the most important components of the SGA. Unlike the shared pool, which caches parsed SQL statements and database method data, the buffer cache is responsible for actually caching database user data. Rows from tables.

The most commonly cited genesis of the technique using OSA is either one of two patents (Caldwell, 1952, Caldwell and Wurzburg, 1953), although these patents did not specifically use OSA as their substituent. When modified with OSA, the normally hydrophilic starch gains a hydrophobic element in the form of octenyl groups (see Fig. 2), resulting in whole molecules with an amphiphilic character.

For a certain class of content and hardware, I think deferred shading is still the clear winner for performance and functionality. The class of content is still very relevant today, which is moderate display resolutions (say up to 1920×1080) and complex scenes (hundreds of meshes, dozens of lights).

I have a Data Flow Task that is hanging on execution. The flow is simple, makes two queries to different tables (Both with a couple of joins), then sorts and merges the outputs through a common id, adds a static column to all the records, saves the row count in a user variable for later use and finally inserts into a table on another DB.
